France CHAMPAGNE

To be called Champagne, a wine has to do more than sparkle; it must come from the region bearing its name in north-east France. To claim that this regions finest wines are better than any others would be wrong, but the finest Champagne has a combination of freshness, richness, delicacy and raciness unmatched by sparkling wine from elsewhere.

At the northerly limit of French viticulture, Champagne is a cool region; the vineyards face north, south and east across open plains. The key ingredient to the region's success is the chalk soil that reflects itself in the firm, crystalline constitution of the finished wine. Dom Perignon did not invent the Champagne process, he did however develop a practice of blending both vintages and vineyards, resulting in any ties with provenance within this roomy appellation of 33'000ha being weakened. The combination of blending and production method means that the final wine shows little resemblance to the paid vin clair with which the cellar-master began his work.

France BORDEAUX

Bordeaux is the largest fine wine region in the world. The whole department of the Gironde, named after its most important estuary, is dedicated to winemaking. Its production, 6 million hectolitres, dwarfs that of other French Wine regions with the exception of the vast Languedoc- Roussillon. The great red wine areas are found in the deep gravel vineyards of the Medoc, north of the city of Bordeaux, and in the Pessac-Leognan on the west bank of the Garonne to the south. These are known as the ‘left-bank’ wines. The ‘right-bank’ consists of St Emilion and Pomerol, plus their satellite communes along the north bank of the Dordogne. The area between the two rivers is called Entre-Deux-Mers, an area that produces much underrated crisp, dry white wines. To the south, where the Garonne river meanders slowly and brings humidity to the vineyards, noble-rot penetrates and helps produce the world’s most sought after sweet wines in the communes of Barsac and Sauternes.

Bordeaux’s stylistic qualities owe much to the marginality of its climate. Variations in vintage add interest but the deluges of 1963, 1968, 1974 and 1977 illustrated how damaging they can be. Winemaking advances have allowed a certain degree of control an additional the drier and warmer summers have taken some of the suspense out of the Bordeaux harvest.

France LOIRE

As a whole they are light and invigorating, with palpable acidity. At the mouth of the river salt marshes quickly give way to Muscadet, the region’s first modern success story. It’s dry, salty and firm style makes it the perfect foil for seafood. Heading east, one finds the vineyards of Touraine and Anjou, home to Chenin, Cabernet Franc and Sauvignon Blanc. The lush landscape is unlikely vine country and the vineyards generally coincide with bluffs of limestone, tufa and schist. Traditionally famous for its sweet wines, now also fine dry wines are produced.

The reds, produced from Cabernet Franc, are some of the world’s most refreshing and vigorous, with raspberry freshness. The most evocative of the Loire’s appellations are Sancerre and Pouilly Fume. A little Pinot has made its way into these vineyards but this is really the domaine of punchy, blackcurrant-scented Sauvignon Blanc. Despite competition from New Zealand, Sancerre and Pouilly Fume have maintained their varietal prominence, principally because the growers are still prepared to sacrifice a little flavour in order to boost Sauvignon’s tactile thrill.

We suggest

Pouilly-Fume 'Baron de L', Baron de Ladoucette, Loire, 2019

France ALSACE WINE

The wines of Alsace reflect the ambivalent situation of a border province. There are two possible physical boundaries between France and Germany; the Rhine and the crest of the Vosges mountains, which run parallel fifteen miles west of the river.

Alsace has never belonged to Germany, except in periods of military occupation. Its language and its economic market maybe, but its soul is entirely French. Alsace makes Germanic wines in a French way. the Germanic tone is set by the climate, the soil and the choice of grape varieties. Where the sharply focussed German wines show some of the exactitude of the national character, Alsace examples are more laid-back, with broader, more rounded flavours.

France RHÔNE

The vineyards of the Rhone valley fall into two categories; the north (Septentrional) which produces less than a tenth of the valleys wine, and almost all fine. And the south (Meridional) which is much more diverse. The vineyards of the Northern Rhône barely stray from the river’s course and the two principal appellations, Côte Rôtie and Hermitage are situated where the curve of the river brings a southerly exposure to the steep valley sides.

Syrah is the dominant grape variety and the parallel rows of vines impose their own geometry on the rugged landscape of granite and limestone.

Côte Rôtie is the most flattering of the two appellations to drink when young, whilst the wines of Hermitage have exceptional staying power. At a dramatic turn in the river, ‘Condrieu’ produces white wines from the extraordinary heady, recognisably perfumed Viognier grape with its aromas of apricots and May blossom.

As you enter the Southern Rhône the steep Mistral buffeted valley gives way to a broad, sunbaked Mediterranean plane. Pines and almond trees yield to olive groves and vines bake in broad terraces. The grape mix is richly varied, Grenache being the dominant quality red grape, increasingly supported by Mourvedre and Syrah. Chateauneuf-du-Pape is the region that best sums up the regions qualities, but the surrounding villages of Gigondas and Vacqueyras are just as able.

France PROVENCE

Provence is blessed with a Mediterranean climate of warm summers and mild winters. With an annual average of up to 3,000 hours, excessive sun is a concern although the heat is alleviated by the northerly mistral wind. Its stunning vineyards, frequently run up to the coast, vines growing in the most desirable of locations.

It is predominantly known for its rosé wines, which account for over half of Provençal production and are usually dry. The brands of Chateau d'Esclans, with their 'Whispering Angel', Minuty and Domaine Ott have utilised Champagne like marketing methods so ensure that the wines of Provence are now the most celebratory of products.

ITALY

Italy has the richest variety of individual wine styles, local climates and the most important indigenous grape varieties of all the world's wine producing countries.

The invading Greeks called Italy Oenotria (the land of wine) and a glance at a wine map reminds us that Italy is carpeted in vines. If slopes, sunshine, soil variety and a temperate climate are essential components of varied, quality wine production then Italy has it all. The long spine of mountains that run from the sheltering Alps almost to North Africa produce the most desirable combination of altitude with latitude and exposure. Despite natural ability, unification only 150 years ago means that quality wine production, appealing to an international market is a relatively recent phenomenon. Today, growers have had their battles with a bureaucracy that wanted to put a permanent-lock on innovation and from top to bottom this is a land brimming with talent and flavour.

SPAIN

The scale and infrastructure of the Spanish wine industry has always emphasised supply over demand. The annual influx of tourists soak up some of the surplus, but Spain's most dependable customers has always been the distilleries. Therefore, any grower heeding the international call for improved quality has had to confront both a backward winemaking culture and the widely held prejudice that Rioja was all that Spain was capable of producing. One criticism levelled at modern winemaking is that it diminished individuality, yet in Spain it has done the very opposite.

After an excess of technological advances Spain is rediscovering her indigenous strengths and traditional practices. The latest generation of white wines from Rueda, Galicia and Navarra are diverse and distinctive, whilst regions such as Priorat have proven that within a region modernised by French grape varieties, Spain's indigenous varieties produce world class wines. The traditional regions of Rioja and Ribera del Duero are also flourishing and starting to abandon a historical over-dependence on oak, allowing grapes picked at their ripe potential to dominate the wine. Spanish wine is enjoying a surge in international popularity with the growers rarely needing to worry about bringing their grapes to full ripeness due to the warm climate and consequently low cost. Spain offers bargains with individual character.

PORTUGAL

Despite its long historical relationship with England, Portugal's geographical isolation has slowed its international recognition and growth for its still wines. Like Spain, Portugal has also struggled to shed its 'one-wine' image, however whilst the rest of the world's wine regions are dominated by international grape varieties, Portugal's adherence to its indigenous grape varieties such as Touriga Nacional and Baga has left it with a point of difference for which it is at last being recognised.

GERMANY

Most of Germany’s finest vineyards lie as far north as grapes can be persuaded to ripen. The vineyards, unfit for normal agriculture would otherwise be forest or bare mountain. Whilst the chances of such sites producing some of the world’s finest white wines look slim, they manage to do it, indeed Germany’s finest wines stamp their quality with a racy authority that no-one can imitate. Riesling, arguably the most capable of all white grapes, maintains its varietal character whilst reflecting the terroir of its site.

Therefore whilst all German Rieslings have that balance of tingling fruit and refreshing acidity, there are clear regional differences. The steep dark slate slopes of the Mosel Valley produce the lightest Rieslings with particularly firm, steely examples coming from its tributaries, the Saar and Ruwer. The south-facing slopes of the Rheingau are drier and sunnier and as a results the wines are slightly fuller. The underrated Nahe lies in between the Mosel and the Rheingau both stylistically and geographically, whilst the large Rheinhessen region can produce firm, full and structured Rieslings, the Pfalz region further south is warmer and so not surprisingly, the wines are slightly fuller and more Alsace-like in character. This is a country that still fights its demons, the 1970’s and 80’s were disastrous for its quality reputation. However Australia and New Zealand have made Riesling fashionable again and Germany is working its way back into international favour.

UNITED STATES

Prohibition in the middle of the last century stunted the growth of the wine industry in America. However the last five decades have seen a rapid catch-up as nearly every state has its own offering of vineyards and gleaming new wineries.

California is still the capital on North American wine production, producing over 90% of the total. The States' vineyard variation comes not from latitude but from the mountains which lie between the vineyards and the Pacific, preventing the sea air and fog moderating the climate.

Regions like Napa, Sonoma and Carneros are now considered classic, although there are 100 different AVA's (American Viticultural Areas) in total. Fashion plays an obvious role in a state like California and many of the cult wineries which command four figure dollar price tags per bottle did not even exist in the 1980's.

In the UK market, the difference between the cheaper 'jug-wines' that fill supermarket aisles and the expensive boutique estates could not be more obvious. This has left the market confused about what California really offers, with most of us only experiencing the huge brands, deplete of quality or regional interest. However an increasing amount of quality wine is reaching our shores at an affordable price. We are discovering that this is winemaking heaven and that somewhere between Washington's Puget Sound and Los Angeles exists the perfect environment for every grape variety that has every been grown, vinified or bottled.

AUSTRALIA

Australia is bigger, hotter and younger than the rest of the wine world, but what really sets it apart is its sheer dynamism. Now the largest exporter to the UK, its fruit-driven wines and value for money have changed a nation. Australia has been criticised for an industrial approach to wine production and a lack of individual character that has come from a tendency to blend too readily. Recently however, more and more single vineyard wines are coming out of Australia as producers recognise the importance of terroir.

South Australia is the main wine state; the ancient Shiraz vines of the Barossa Valley produce the most concentrated of reds. Riesling, grown in the Clare Valley on slate reminiscent of the Germany's Mosel Valley, has established itself as a New World classic. Coonawarra offers one of the world's most concrete explanations of terroir through its distinctive Cabernet Sauvignon grown on a distinct strip of 'Terra-Rossa' soil.

Elsewhere the cities of Sydney and Melbourne have their adjoining wine regions in the form of the Hunter and Yarra Valley. Close to Perth, the wine regions of Western Australia are cooled by the brisk sea breezes from the Southern Ocean and result in some of the cleanest, most refreshing whites and reds in Australia.

SOUTH AFRICA

To the casual observer, the Cape vineyards may look just as they did in the decades running up to Apartheid; dominant mountains, wild seas and vivid green pastures dotted with brilliant facades of 300 year old Cape Dutch homesteads. The reality is that the vineyards, cellars and wines have changed beyond recognition.

The Cape boasts the oldest geology in the wine-growing world, much is also made of the fact that the meeting if two oceans, the Indian and the Atlantic creates a perfect environment for grape growing. The KWV, the giant co-operative designed to provide market control prices during Apartheid inhibited independent estates from starting up and did little for the region's quality. However, since 1994 a new generation of young winemakers who have travelled the world and soaked up techniques and inspiration are in control and the results have been incredible. After decades of turmoil, the South African wine industry has a happy ending in sight.

ARGENTINA

After Europe, South America is the world’s most important wine producing continent. It is the oldest New World wine producer and its history is heavily influenced by immigrants and their descendants, initially the Spanish and Portuguese and more recently the Italians, Germans and French.

Until the mid-nineties Argentina has almost no international aspirations for its wine industry and produced vast quantities of mediocre wine. The last two decades have witnessed remarkable change to make it one of the world’s most interesting sources of quality wine. The country’s vineyards sit alongside the Andes, their thin mountain air barely resisting the sun’s rays. Malbec is the country’s favoured red, a grape that struggled for reputation in France, here produces one of South America’s most compelling wines.

CHILE

Geographically Chile is one of the world’s most isolated nations. Pencil thin, it has the Andes to the east, the Pacific to the the west, the Atacama Desert to the north and Antartica to the south. The fertile and fruitful strip is climatically perfect for growing grapes and its remoteness has prevented the arrival of the deadly Phylloxera louse.

Compared with Argentina, the vineyards of Chile are lower-lying and their wines earthier. Many vineyards are planted with red and white grapes and the resulting profusion of styles has created a reputation for reliability rather than creativity. The last decade has seen a growing understanding of the regional differences within Chile and the quality and interest of the wine it produces seems to improve every vintage.

DESSERT WINES

There is a saying in the wine trade that you can make poor wine from great quality grapes, but you cannot make great wine from poor grapes. It emphasises the importance of the raw ingredients in wine production, highlighting that no winemaker, however capable can create wine of real quality without having ripe grapes, balanced in acids and tannins that have a character that can be reflected in the finished wine.

Whilst the ‘great grapes’ analogy works for most wine, it is one that is difficult to defend if you have ever had a chance to see the black, heavily rotted grapes that are hand harvested from the vineyards of Sauternes before they are pressed and slowly fermented into one of the world’s greatest sweet wines. Hanging on the vine, the grapes covered in a thick fungal mould look unpleasant to say the least, yet the juice within is some of the wine world’s most precious.

Fine sweet wines are made in a number of methods. The concentrating effect on both sugar and acidity of Botrytis Cinerea certainly produces some of the finest, but many world class sweet wines are produced without its influence. What is uniform is the patience, care and pure passion that goes into sweet wine production. Undervalued, they are some of the wine world’s most fascinating creations.

FORTIFIED WINES

The fortunes of Sherry and Port are tied up with historical patronage and date back to a period when England either traded with its neighbours or met them head on in battle. Consequently, Port’s emergence as a wine region owed more to an ongoing 18th Century European power struggle than it did to any particular refinement in Georgian taste.

This sense of history pervades the town of Oporto but as you move along the Douro River to the Baixo Gorge the vibrant city is left behind and the dramatically steep and primitive valley becomes more impressive with every turn. This is hard country to work, but the results are worth the effort. Port remains a completely unique product, under-valued and under-priced.

The rolling chalk-hills of Jerez and its proximity to the Atlantic mean the labour is less brutish. Chalk’s ability to ration water and impart its own mineral quality to the wine is as vital to the growers of Jerez and it is to those of Champagne, so despite making the northern and southern limits of European viticulture, both regions stay within the bounds of the same terroir driven faith.
