France CHAMPAGNE

To earn the prestigious label of Champagne, a wine must do more than simply sparkle; it must originate from the designated region in northeast France. Although it would be inaccurate to claim that the finest wines from this region surpass all others, the pinnacle of Champagne embodies a unique fusion of freshness, richness, delicacy, and liveliness, a quality unparalleled by sparkling wines from elsewhere.

Situated at the northernmost boundary of French viticulture, Champagne enjoys a cool climate, with vineyards spanning north, south, and east across expansive plains. The linchpin of the region's success lies in its chalky soil, which imparts a firm, crystalline character to the resulting wines.

Although Dom Perignon didn't pioneer the Champagne process, he revolutionised it by introducing the practice of blending both vintages and vineyards. This approach has somewhat diluted the ties to specific origins within the sprawling appellation encompassing 33,000 hectares. The combination of blending techniques and production methods results in a final product bearing little resemblance to the still base wine, or "vin clair," with which the cellar master initially began.

BORDEAUX & LANGUEDOC

Bordeaux is the largest fine wine region in the world. The whole department of the Gironde, named after its most important estuary, is dedicated to winemaking. It's production, 6 million hectolitres, dwarfs that of other French Wine regions with the exception of the vast Languedoc- Roussillon. The great red wine areas are found in the deep gravel vineyards of the Medoc, north of the city of Bordeaux, and in the Pessac-Leognan on the west bank of the Garonne to the south. These are known as the 'left-bank' wines. The 'right-bank' consists of St Emilion and Pomerol, plus their satellite communes along the north bank of the Dordogne. The area between the two rivers is called Entre-Deux-Mers, an area that produces highly underrated crisp, dry white wines. To the south, where the Garonne river meanders slowly and brings humidity to the vineyards, noble-rot penetrates and helps produce the world's most sought after sweet wines in the communes of Barsac and Sauternes.

The distinct stylistic characteristics of Bordeaux wines are greatly influenced by the marginality of its climate. While variations in vintage contribute to the region's allure, the heavy rains experienced in 1963, 1968, 1974, and 1977 underscored the potentially devastating impact of extreme weather events. Advancements in winemaking techniques have provided a measure of control, and the trend toward drier and warmer summers has mitigated some of the uncertainty surrounding the Bordeaux harvest.

France LOIRE

As a collective, Loire Valley wines exude a lightness and vitality, underscored by a palpable acidity that enlivens the palate. At the river's mouth, where salt marshes yield to vineyards, Muscadet emerges as the region's inaugural modern triumph. Characterised by its dry, saline, and structured profile, Muscadet serves as the quintessential companion to seafood. Journeying eastward, one encounters the vineyards of Touraine and Anjou, where Chenin Blanc, Cabernet Franc, and Sauvignon Blanc reign supreme. Amidst the verdant landscape, seemingly improbable for viticulture, vineyards cling to limestone bluffs, tufa, and schist. While historically renowned for its luscious sweet wines, the region now showcases an impressive array of dry varietals, exemplifying its evolution as a producer of fine wines.

The reds, produced from Cabernet Franc, are some of the world's most refreshing and vigorous, with raspberry freshness. The most evocative of the Loire's appellations are Sancerre and Pouilly Fume. A little Pinot has made its way into these vineyards but this is really the domaine of punchy, blackcurrant-scented Sauvignon Blanc. Despite competition from New Zealand, Sancerre and Pouilly Fume have maintained their varietal prominence, principally because the growers are still prepared to sacrifice a little flavour in order to boost Sauvignon's tactile thrill.

We suggest

France RHÔNE

The vineyards of the Rhône Valley are divided into two distinct categories: the Northern (Septentrional) region, responsible for less than a tenth of the valley's wine production but renowned for its exceptional quality, and the Southern (Méridional) region, which boasts greater diversity. In the Northern Rhône, vineyards closely follow the course of the river, with the two primary appellations, Côte Rôtie and Hermitage, strategically positioned where the river's curve grants a southern exposure to the steep slopes of the valley.

Syrah is the dominant grape variety and the parallel rows of vines impose their own geometry on the rugged landscape of granite and limestone.

Côte Rôtie is the most flattering of the two appellations to drink when young, whilst the wines of Hermitage have exceptional staying power. At a dramatic turn in the river, 'Condrieu' produces white wines from the extraordinary heady, recognisably perfumed Viognier grape with its aromas of apricots and May blossom.

As you enter the Southern Rhône the steep Mistral buffeted valley gives way to a broad, sunbaked Mediterranean plane. Pines and almond trees yield to olive groves and vines bake in broad terraces. The grape mix is richly varied, Grenache being the dominant quality red grape, increasingly supported by Mourvedre and Syrah. Châteauneuf-du-Pape is the region that best sums up the regions qualities, but the surrounding villages of Gigondas and Vacqueyras are just as able.

France PROVENCE

Provence is blessed with a Mediterranean climate of warm summers and mild winters. With an annual average of up to 3,000 hours, excessive sun is a concern although the heat is alleviated by the northerly mistral wind. Its stunning vineyards, frequently run up to the coast, vines growing in the most desirable of locations.

Predominantly celebrated for its rosé wines, which comprise over half of Provençal production and typically boast a dry profile. Brands such as Château d'Esclans, renowned for its 'Whispering Angel', along with Minuty and Domaine Ott, have employed Champagne-like marketing strategies, elevating the wines of Provence to the status of highly coveted celebratory products.

ITALY

Italy boasts the most diverse array of individual wine styles, local climates, and crucially, the most significant collection of indigenous grape varieties among all the world's wine-producing countries.

The invading Greeks bestowed upon Italy the name "Oenotria," meaning the land of wine, a title that resonates through the ages as one surveys Italy's wine map, revealing a landscape blanketed with vineyards. If slopes, sunshine, soil diversity, and a temperate climate are the essential ingredients for diverse and high-quality wine production, then Italy possesses them in abundance. The extensive spine of mountains stretching from the protective Alps to almost North Africa creates an ideal combination of altitude, latitude, and exposure. Despite its inherent viticultural prowess, Italy's unification a mere 150 years ago marked the beginning of quality wine production tailored for an international audience—a relatively recent development. Today, Italian growers have navigated battles with bureaucratic obstacles that once hindered innovation. From top to bottom, Italy remains a land teeming with talent and flavor, a testament to its rich winemaking heritage.

SPAIN

The scale and infrastructure of the Spanish wine industry has always emphasised supply over demand. The annual influx of tourists soak up some of the surplus, but Spain's most dependable customers has always been the distilleries. Therefore, any grower heeding the international call for improved quality has had to confront both a backward winemaking culture and the widely held prejudice that Rioja was all that Spain was capable of producing. One criticism levelled at modern winemaking is that it diminished individuality, yet in Spain it has done the very opposite.

After an excess of technological advances Spain is rediscovering her indigenous strengths and traditional practices. The latest generation of white wines from Rueda, Galicia and Navarra are diverse and distinctive, whilst regions such as Priorat have proven that within a region modernised by French grape varieties, Spain's indigenous varieties produce world class wines. The traditional regions of Rioja and Ribera del Duero are also flourishing and starting to abandon a historical over-dependence on oak, allowing grapes picked at their ripe potential to dominate the wine. Spanish wine is enjoying a surge in international popularity with the growers rarely needing to worry about bringing their grapes to full ripeness due to the warm climate and consequently low cost. Spain offers bargains with individual character.

GERMANY, AUSTRIA & HUNGARY

Most of Germany's finest vineyards lie as far north as grapes can be persuaded to ripen. The vineyards, unfit for normal agriculture would otherwise be forest or bare mountain. Whilst the chances of such sites producing some of the world's finest white wines look slim, they manage to do it, indeed Germany's finest wines stamp their quality with a racy authority that no-one can imitate. Riesling, arguably the most capable of all white grapes, maintains its varietal character whilst reflecting the terroir of its site.

Therefore whilst all German Rieslings have that balance of tingling fruit and refreshing acidity, there are clear regional differences. The steep dark slate slopes of the Mosel Valley produce the lightest Rieslings with particularly firm, steely examples coming from its tributaries, the Saar and Ruwer. The south-facing slopes of the Rheingau are drier and sunnier and as a result the wines are slightly fuller.

The underrated Nahe lies in between the Mosel and the Rheingau both stylistically and geographically, whilst the large Rheinhessen region can produce firm, full and structured Rieslings. The Pfalz region further south is warmer and so not surprisingly, the wines are slightly fuller and more Alsace-like in character. This is a country that still fights its demons, the 1970's and 80's were disastrous for its quality reputation. However Australia and New Zealand have made Riesling fashionable again and Germany is working its way back into international favour.

UNITED STATES

Prohibition in the middle of the last century stunted the growth of the wine industry in America. However the last five decades have seen a rapid catch-up as nearly every state has its own offering of vineyards and gleaming new wineries.

California is still the capital on North American wine production, producing over 90% of the total. The States' vineyard variation comes not from latitude but from the mountains which lie between the vineyards and the Pacific, preventing the sea air and fog moderating the climate.

Regions like Napa, Sonoma and Carneros are now considered classic, although there are 100 different AVA's (American Viticultural Areas) in total. Fashion plays an obvious role in a state like California and many of the cult wineries which command four figure dollar price tags per bottle did not even exist in the 1980's.

In the UK market, the difference between the cheaper 'jug-wines' that fill supermarket aisles and the expensive boutique estates could not be more obvious. This has left the market confused about what California really offers, with most of us only experiencing the huge brands, deplete of quality or regional interest. However an increasing amount of quality wine is reaching our shores at an affordable price. We are discovering that this is winemaking heaven and that somewhere between Washington's Puget Sound and Los Angeles exists the perfect environment for every grape variety that has every been grown, vinified or bottled.

NEW ZEALAND

New Zealand winemaking embodies a harmonious blend of tradition, innovation, and terroir-driven excellence. Nestled amidst breathtaking landscapes, from the rolling hills of Marlborough to the rugged terrain of Central Otago, vineyards thrive in diverse microclimates. Renowned for its Sauvignon Blanc, New Zealand's winemakers have also made significant strides with Pinot Noir, Chardonnay, and other varietals. Sustainability is a cornerstone of the industry, with many producers prioritizing organic and biodynamic practices.

The New Zealand wine industry is not only very new, it is also modern in terms of the styles of wine it produces. In 1960, the country had only 1,000 acres of vines, mainly around the Auckland area, largely planted with hybrids. Today there are over 55,000 acres planted and over 550 producers. For such a small and ocean-bound country, New Zealand offers a remarkable diversity of climate which has allowed it to succeed with distinctive varietals, most notably Sauvignon Blanc and Pinot Noir.

Marlborough, at the top of the South Island, is the largest and most well known wine region (the home of Cloudy Bay), where distinctive and exemplary Sauvignon Blancs are produced as well as high quality Chardonnay. Today New Zealand is considered as the leading source of Pinot Noir outside Burgundy, with such regions as Martinborough and Central Otago producing wonderfully pure, intense and beautifully balanced wine. Pinot Gris, Riesling and Merlot are also enjoying wonderful success throughout much of the North and South Islands' wine growing regions.

AUSTRALIA

Australia's wine industry stands as a testament to dynamism, fueled by its vast expanse, sun-drenched climates, and youthful spirit. As the UK's leading wine exporter, Australia has reshaped palates with its fruit-forward wines and exceptional value. While once criticised for an industrial approach and a tendency towards homogeneity through blending, the landscape is evolving. Producers now embrace the significance of terroir, yielding an array of single vineyard wines that showcase the unique character of their respective regions. This shift reflects a deeper commitment to quality and individuality, solidifying Australia's position as a dynamic force in the global wine scene.

South Australia is the main wine state; the ancient Shiraz vines of the Barossa Valley produce the most concentrated of reds. Riesling, grown in the Clare Valley on slate reminiscent of the Germany's Mosel Valley, has established itself as a New World classic. Coonawarra offers one of the world's most concrete explanations of terroir through its distinctive Cabernet Sauvignon grown on a distinct strip of 'Terra-Rossa' soil. Elsewhere, the cities of Sydney and Melbourne have their adjoining wine regions in the form of the Hunter and Yarra Valley. Close to Perth, the wine regions of Western Australia are cooled by the brisk sea breezes from the Southern Ocean and result in some of the cleanest, most refreshing whites and reds in Australia.

SOUTH AFRICA

To the casual observer, the Cape vineyards may look just as they did in the decades running up to Apartheid; dominant mountains, wild seas and vivid green pastures dotted with brilliant facades of 300 year old Cape Dutch homesteads. The reality is that the vineyards, cellars and wines have changed beyond recognition.

The Cape boasts the oldest geology in the wine-growing world, much is also made of the fact that the meeting of two oceans, the Indian and the Atlantic creates a perfect environment for grape growing. The KWV, the giant co-operative designed to provide market control prices during Apartheid inhibited independent estates from starting up and did little for the region's quality. However, since 1994 a new generation of young winemakers who have travelled the world and soaked up techniques and inspiration are in control and the results have been incredible. After decades of turmoil, the South African wine industry has a happy ending in sight.

ARGENTINA

After Europe, South America is the world's most important wine producing continent. It is the oldest New World wine producer and its history is heavily influenced by immigrants and their descendants, initially the Spanish and Portuguese and more recently the Italians, Germans and French.

Until the mid-nineties Argentina has almost no international aspirations for its wine industry and produced vast quantities of mediocre wine. The last two decades have witnessed remarkable change to make it one of the world's most interesting sources of quality wine. The country's vineyards sit alongside the Andes, their thin mountain air barely resisting the sun's rays. Malbec is the country's favoured red, a grape that struggled for reputation in France, here produces one of South America's most compelling wines.

ISREAL

Often referred to as the “land of milk and honey” in ancient texts, the sector has emerged as a vibrant and dynamic winemaking region.

Nestled between the Mediterranean Sea and the Judean Hills, Israel’s diverse microclimates and rich soils create a perfect terroir for cultivating grapes. With a winemaking tradition dating back thousands of years, modern Israeli winemakers blend ancient techniques with innovative practices to produce wines of exceptional quality and character. From the robust reds of the Galilee region to the crisp whites of the Golan Heights, Israel’s winemaking industry continues to flourish, gaining international recognition for its distinctive flavours and commitment to excellence.

SWEET WINES

There is a saying in the wine trade that you can make poor wine from great quality grapes, but you cannot make great wine from poor grapes. It emphasises the importance of the raw ingredients in wine production, highlighting that no winemaker, however capable can create wine of real quality without having ripe grapes, balanced in acids and tannins that have a character that can be reflected in the finished wine.

Whilst the 'great grapes' analogy works for most wine, it is one that is difficult to defend if you have ever had a chance to see the black, heavily rotted grapes that are hand harvested from the vineyards of Sauternes before they are pressed and slowly fermented into one of the world's greatest sweet wines. Hanging on the vine, the grapes covered in a thick fungal mould look unpleasant to say the least, yet the juice within is some of the wine world's most precious.

Fine sweet wines are made in a number of methods. The concentrating effect on both sugar and acidity of Botrytis Cinerea certainly produces some of the finest, but many world class sweet wines are produced without its influence. What is uniform is the patience, care and pure passion that goes into sweet wine production. Undervalued, they are some of the wine world's most fascinating creations.
